1. The Reconnaissance School for Non-Commissioned Officers (Podtustojnicka skola pruzkumna) in Sumperk (P50/N69) conducts a seven-month course to train units for penetration of enemy lines, reconnaissance, guerrilla warfare and sabotage. On completion of the course the men return to their original outfits to instruct special reconnaissance platoons (usually two platoons of the headquarters company) in the infantry units. During 1949 the only requirements for selection to the school were superior intelligence and physical fitness. No requirement as to political reliability from the Communist viewpoint was made. On an average, two men were chosen from each infantry company in the Czech army. A majority of the men attending the school were graduates of a secondary school. Prior to 1949 these men would have been sent to a reserve officers' school. However, since that time, only those with the best school grades have been sent to reserve officers' schools; the remainder have gone to non-commissioned officers' schools of one sort or another.
2. After six weeks of infantry training the men are trained for about four months in guerrilla tactics, reconnaissance, sniping, sabotage, and the spreading of demoralizing propaganda among enemy troops. These tactics are carried on by groups of squad strength. During a final six-week training period, similar maneuvers are carried on by units of company strength in the region around Sumperk, often in cooperation with other units. In addition to the above-mentioned training, the men are given rigorous physical exercise and practice in the use of all types of light weapons, bazookas, flame throwers, knives, strangling wire and jiu-jitsu. Firing, except with the bazookas, is done with live ammunition. Weapons used at the school include Mauser 98N and CZ 24 rifles, Czech, Soviet, German and Italian model sub-machine guns, Czech model 25 light machine guns, Czech model 37 heavy machine guns, pistols, hand grenades, German bazookas and flame throwers. The strength of the companies diminished sharply during 1950 as a result of the elimination of those not physically fit for the strenuous training and those not politically reliable. Thus, the strength of Company K fell from 182 to 130 men, that of Company I from 120 to about 85, and that of Company X from 230 to 180 men.
